May Be Victim of Recall.

WHAT WILL CONGRESS DO WITH PEPPER BILL?

Military Men Closely Following Measure Which Many Believe Necessary to Maintain High Standard of National Guard.

[Special to The Times-Dispatch.] Washington, December 1.—What will Congress do with the Pepper militia pay bill? Military men all over the country are closely following this measure, and its consideration at last session of Congress brought out both favorable and unfavorable criticism.

In order to maintain the standard of efficiency now required of the national guard, which must be insisted upon if it is to be considered a dependable force, an enlisted man must attend regular instruction in the army, including gallery practice, target practice on the range, and not less than from five to ten days instruction in camp each year.

The law requires attendance at not less than twenty-four drills each year, and as stated, five days spent in camp instruction, but the present state of efficiency demanded by the Federal government cannot be reached without devoting additional time, especially on the part of the officers.

One of the main objects of the bill is to pay officers and enlisted men amounts according to the duties required of them, so that a man may serve without financial sacrifice, and in order that the National Guard may have the service of a larger number of young men throughout the country financial obligations which must be met by them.

From last reports the National Guard is not holding its own. The best figures available showing a decrease of 1,672 men.

The present cost to the Federal government for training the National Guard is something like $5,000,000 a year. In addition to this the several States make their own appropriations for their troops, and the aggregate amounts so appropriated are about equal to the total amount allowed by Congress for all militia purposes.

In order to provide an additional safeguard for the Federal government and to insure proper care of equipment issued to the States, it is proposed that stoppages may be made against the amounts going to members to pay for loss of property by members of the guard.

One of the most important provisions of the whole bill is that requiring organizations to be transferred as organized, tactically, at the date when the call is made. This section, it is believed, will encourage the organization of the National Guard on proper tactical lines. It must be so organized here it can take the field and fight. If the forces of the various States are properly balanced, it is not difficult to mold them into tactical units of a higher order. If they are not so organized, it means that units must be drawn from a very wide section of the United States, in order to make up the tactical divisions.

But there is considerable objection in many States to the passage of this bill. Among other things, it has been said that if Federal pay is allowed the National Guard, it will grow rapidly in number and influence, and that it will use its influence to increase its demands upon the Federal government. This proposition is not tenable, friends of the bill say, and they further take the position that the measure will not only be the means of rejuvenating the National Guard, if passed, but that it will put new life into it upon such a basis as could not possibly be secured in any other way.

In view of this opposition, military men everywhere would welcome the passage of a bill, whether the one referred to or some other, which would work for their benefit and for the benefit of the States they serve.

It is quite likely that within a very short time active steps will be taken by the House Committee on Military Affairs to get military matters under way for the present session.

There is every means to believe that with certain amendments which are acceptable to all persons, and that it will use its influence to increase its demands upon the Federal government.
